Contemporary distillery

Through a balance of memory, staging, and technical mastery, La Maison Livernois embodies a vibrant and narrative space, celebrating both Quebec's heritage and today's artisanal craftsmanship.

Integrated lighting is a key component of the project. It alternates between indirect light and targeted effects to shape volumes, reveal textures, and create a soft, evolving ambiance from day to night. Directional spotlights, concealed light strips, and pendant fixtures anchor the various zones of the restaurant while highlighting architectural and finishing details.

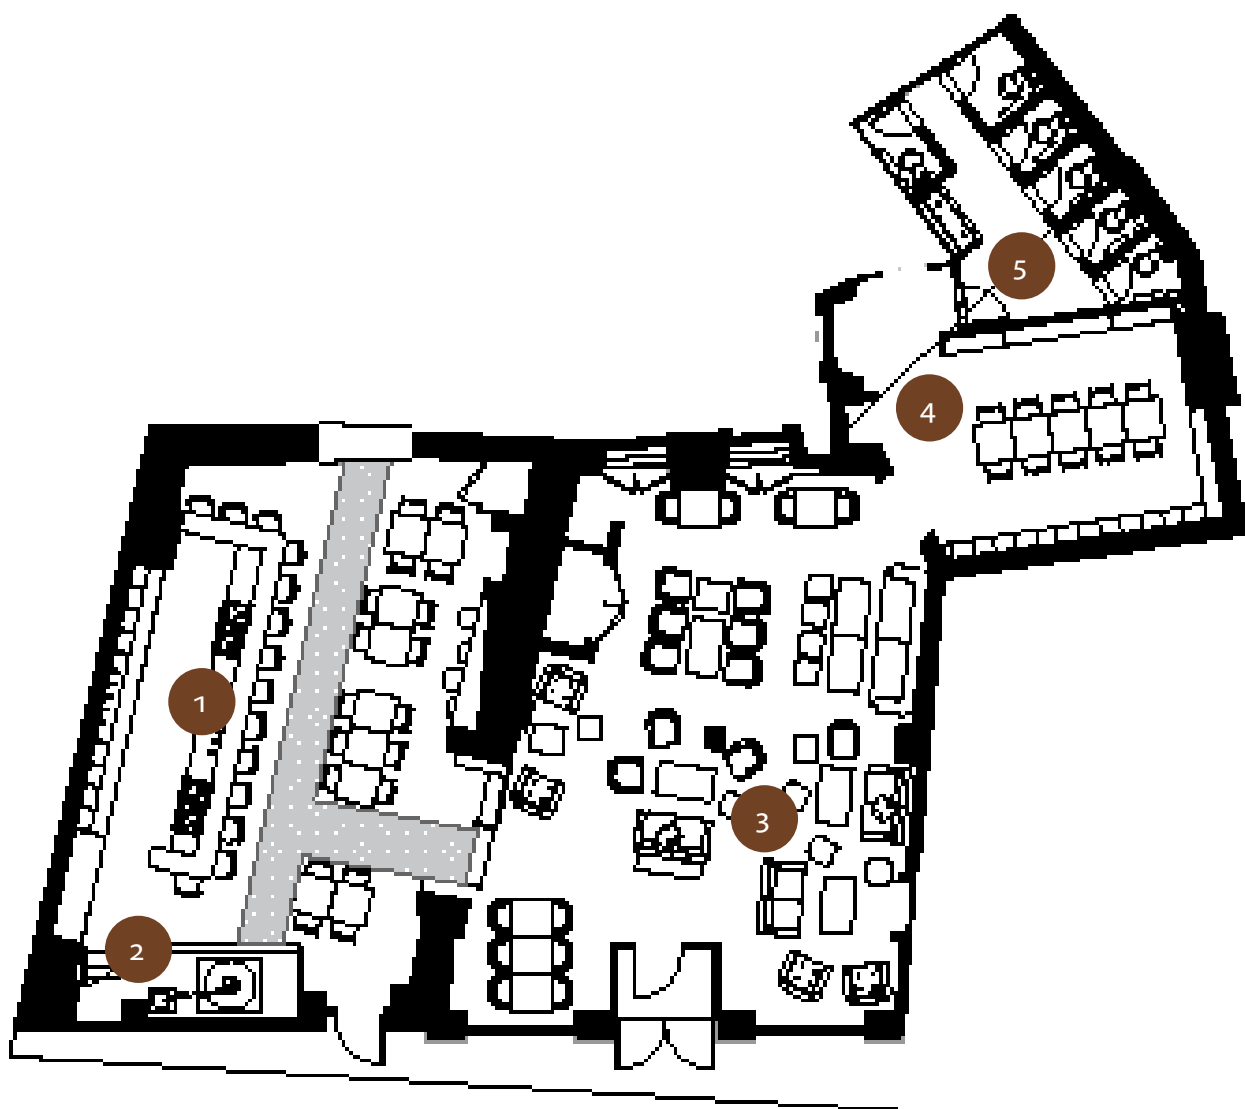

The signature element of the project is the bar area, clad in wood, with integrated storage and backlit display shelves. It serves as a visual landmark. In this zone, a metal mesh grid embedded in the floor guides visitors' path while offering a transparent view of the technical conduits leading to the distillation equipment, including a visible copper still. This architectural gesture reveals the behind-the-scenes of production and celebrates artisanal craftsmanship.

At the back, the tasting lab evokes a warm wine cellar, with barrels suspended from the ceiling and a soft, intimate atmosphere. It features a series of integrated black storage units inspired by old apothecaries, with small drawers and golden handles, designed for both functionality and aesthetics. The space hosts group tastings in a cozy setting, where raw textures meet thoughtful storytelling.

The entire project also stands out for the variety of seating options offered, enhancing user comfort: poufs, high stools, chairs, and upholstered banquettes coexist to create diverse and adaptable atmospheres throughout the day.

Down to the smallest corners—including the restrooms, adorned with paper archives drawn from the Livernois family history—every detail pays tribute to the past. In continuity, each spirit produced on-site bears the name of a family member, highlighting the project's deep-rooted identity.
